The slaughter at Fort Pillow was no doubt driven in large part by racial hatred. Numbers alone suggest this: Of 295 white troops, 168 were marched to prison camps, but of 262 black troops, only 58 were taken into custody, with the rest either dead or too badly wounded to walk.<sup>16</sup> A Southern reporter traveling with Forrest makes clear that the discrimination was deliberate: "Our troops, maddened by the excitement, shot down the retreating Yankees, and not until they had attained the water's edge and turned to beg for mercy did any prisoners fall into our hands--Thus the whites received quarter, but the Negroes were shown no mercy."<sup>17</sup> Union surgeon Dr. Charles Fitch, who was taken prisoner by Forrest, testified that after he was in custody he saw Confederate soldiers "kill every Negro who made his appearance in Federal uniform."<sup>18</sup>

Fort Pillow is not the only instance of a massacre or threatened massacre of black soldiers by troops under Forrest's command. Biographer Brian Steel Wills points out that at Brice's Cross Roads in June 1864, "black soldiers suffered inordinately" as Forrest looked the other way and Confederate soldiers deliberately sought out those they termed "the damned negroes."<sup>19</sup> Just a day after Fort Pillow, on April 13, 1864, one of Forrest's generals, Abraham Buford, after consulting with Forrest, demanded that the federal garrison in Columbus, Kentucky, surrender. The demand stated that if an attack became necessary, "no quarter will be shown to the negro troops whatever; the white troops will be treated as prisoners of war."<sup>20</sup>

Nathan Bedford Forrest, a crude man who had made his fortune as a slave trader, was noted for both his violence and his hatred of blacks. In the words of historian James M. McPherson, Forrest
