The stand you use shouldn't matter. As long as the saw has accessory holes on the back, you should be able to mount a Sega Hood.The Sega Hood mounting posts have a diameter of about 9/16&22&2. They are designed for standard accessory holes and may not fit some small saws. Check the size of the accessory hole before purchasing. Can you put a large suction duct in the bottom instead of the larger hole to create some negative pressure? Yes, absolutely! There's a velcro opening that will easily hold a suction hose at the bottom Á"We actually do it all the time in our shop! The Sawhood PRO has a drawstring hole that will allow you to do the same thing as well! Will it work with the wet saws for cutting stones? Yes, it is! You'll probably need the saw tile clamp to attach it, as most of these saws don't have mounting holes accessories! There's something available for with PVC or composite debris? I tried the static protection and the vacuum cleaner on the way, but nothing really helps! Unfortunately, this is a big problem with composite and PVC coatings. Soon we will come out with a new saw hood which is wood and corrugated plastic and should work better for this, but it will not be easily transportable transportable Sites, it's more a store bonnet. For standard saw bonnet, an antistatic spray is useful, but it does not last long, and repeated coatings during work are needed and become expensive and expensive. Put the hood of the saw in the water could actually help a little, and be cheaper than antistatic spray and ID may perhaps give a test, but the only way I know for sure to help is really to set up a cooling system on the Cut itself, something as you would have on a CNC machine, or on a tile saw. Grizzly makes some stand-alone refrigerant systems that could be set to a work site, but I'm not sure if they will try enough flow, and even you're going to end up with a mess in the throat of your saw and all the ground. And the control of the dust on the Sawhood store? It is very easy to cut a small hole for a vacuum. Otherwise, the Saw Hood Pro has an integrated opening. What is the diameter of Saw Hoodie assembly posts? The Saw Hoodie mounting poles are about 9/16Á diameter. They are intended for standard accessories holes and cannot adapt to some small saws.
