(December 2017) (More information on how and when removing this template message) A proactive attitude is a mental state held by an agent towards a proposition. Linguistically, propositional attitudes are indicated by a verb (for example, "believed") governing an embedded "which" clause, for example, "of Sally believes that she had won". Propositional attitudes are often taken to be the fundamental units of thought and their contents, being propositions are true or false from the point of view of the person. An agent's attitude towards a proposition is often taken to be the same as the agent's attitude towards the truth of the proposition. Perhaps with the intention thrown to a good extent. For example, we often find in front with the question whether or not a person's statements are conforming to her beliefs. Discrepancies here can happen for many reasons, but when the start of assertion from faith is intentional, which we usually call that a lie. Other comparisons of multiple modes that arise frequently are relations between doubt and knowledge, and discrepancies that occur between observations, expectations and intentions. Deviations of observations from expectations are commonly perceived as surprises, phenomena than to present explanations to reduce amazement shock. Logic problems, formal properties of verbs as they assert, believe, of command, consider, deny, doubt, imagine, judge, know, I want, desire, and a myriad of others involving attitudes or intentions towards the propositions are known for their reluctance to analysis. (Quine 1956). Indiscernibility of the identical Additional information: USEA Mention Distinction One of the fundamental principles on identity is that of replacement (clarification required), also known as fungibility. A c or c as could also be called that of indiscernibility of identical. It provides that, given a true declaration of identity, one of its two terms can be replaced for each other in any true statement and the result will be true. It is easy to find cases against this principle. For example, (1) Giordano, Giordano, (2) Giordano was so fugible, (3) c occurred, (4) c occurred, (5) c occurred, (6) c occurred, (7) c occurred, (8) c occurred, (9) c occurred, (10) c
