The part of the page is fixed on an access <sup>3</sup> using hydraulic or mecAnnic staples. Some traditional vertical-approach machines are dual RAM, which means that there are two rams mounted on the same machine and sharing the same hydraulic and mechanical systems. In many cases, the machine is protected on a shipping table or a balancing table, so that the operator can carry a part to be machined, while the other RAM is cutting another part at the same time. Dual RAM vertical drill machines can also be used to cut two or more successive µ operations on the same page. Vertical approach machines can also be used to cut internal and formal shapes, and can perform much like traditional horizontal machines. In each case, the part of the arm itself is guaranteed while the part of the leg travels in a table. The old machine type can be a vertical pull-down or pull-up variety (referring to the movement of the Broaching tool). The latter is typically referred to as a table vertical drill machine.
